

Trials of a Staff-Officer.

Those who have enjoyed Capt. Charles King's popular novels will be pleased to read the sketches of military life in this volume. Actual experiences at West Point and elsewhere are related, such as the tribulations of "Mr. X" as an adjutant and ordnance officer, the trouble about the colored cadet, and the episode of "the ambitious mamma of an only son," bent on seeing him comfortably through the course. The graver pictures of army life, in actual service, or at the Military Academy, are relieved by an amusing sketch, "The Telephone as an Adjunct to the National Guard," and the account of the election of the mayor of Oglethorpe. In "The Advantages of One's Own Workshop," Captain King tells how and where some of his books were written, revealing his own personality in an engaging manner.
