

ican readers. He is not blind to the connection between the Dutch uprising and the American Revolution, nor to the precedent it furnished for the Declaration of Independence. Back of this, however, lay the Pilgrim training in the school of Dutch independence. Holland was the cradle of modern liberty; and it is fortunate that this history, which is destined to pass into the hands of so many young readers, is handled by an author who understands the real greatness of it. English as he is, Professor Rogers does not spare his own country in its treatment of Holland. In another point this history is good reading for American youth; it brings out with great force the wreck which may be made of a national history which started on the highest plane but fell into the hands of selfish, intriguing and unprincipled politicians who built up, under the safeguards of liberty, a system of corruption and oppression under which the State sank. ....The latest numbers in "The Story of the Nations" series are The Story of Medieval France from the reign of Hugues Capet to the beginning of the eighteenth century, by Gustave Manon, assistant master and librarian of Harrow School, and The Story of Holland, by Thorold Rogers, of Oxford. The first of these, like the other numbers of the series, is written in an attractive style for young readers in whose interest the author has found and hit the happy medium between what is required for the scholar and the school-boy. The volume is fully provided with historical and chronological tables, lists of authorities and ample directions how and where to find fuller and more detailed information. It also contains a considerable number of illustrations and the more useful features of a plenty of serviceable historical maps. Special attention is given in the volume to the intellectual development of France; to its growth in art, language and social life as well as to its political consolidation. The well-known position and accurate learning of the author make it hardly necessary to add that the best authorities have been used in the preparation of the work and the most recent sources of knowledge consulted. (G. P. Putnam's Sons. ($1.50.)—The Story of Holland has fallen, by great good fortune, to Prof. James E. Thorold Rogers, of Oxford, who, as much as any perhaps more than any man in England, is in sympathy with those aspects of the Holland history which give it the peculiar interest it has for Amer-
