

Prince Rupert, the Buccaneer, is one of Cutcliff Hyne's rollicking tales of adventure, the scene of which is laid on the Caribbean in the days of Charles II. One is apt to read it with interest and then rail at one's folly. (Frederick A. Stokes Company.)

Henry D. Northrop has joined the ranks of those impelled to write a book about a David Harum they once knew up-State. The story, John Winslow, would make a good play for Denman Thompson, and the author delights in upper-gallery sentimentality. (G. W. Dillingham Company. $1.50.)

It is seldom that any autobiography is so imbued with the personality of the author as The Stage Reminiscences of Mrs. Gilbert, edited by Charlotte M. Martin. Should the book be read by all who love and admire Mrs. Gilbert, it will have a wide circulation. (Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.)

Practical Golf, by Walter J. Travis, is both clear and concise. It not only tells you what to do and what to avoid, but it gives the reasons. It is illustrated with excellent photographs and cannot fail to help any earnest student of the game. (Harper and Brothers. $2.00.)

The Lovers of the Woods is a rather pleasing little volume, more essay than story, treating of woodcraft and outdoor sport in the Adirondacks. It is by W. H. Boardman. (McClure, Phillips and Company.)
