

historic incident, telling illustration, quaint allusion and ringing apothegm. Young people, who desire better acquaintance with the features and sentiments of those to whom they owe so much, may wisely turn here for information not elsewhere so readily and pleasantly attainable. (New York: E. B. Treat. Pp. 405. $1.50.)

The Story of Extinct Civilizations. By Robert E. Anderson. This new number of the "Library of Useful Stories" gives, in rapid but well-defined outline, the latest conclusions as to the origin and early history of the nations. The writer accepts the rapidly growing opinion that the Babylonian preceded the Egyptian civilization. The interesting, but as yet incomplete, story of the Hittites is recounted fully, while ancient Persia receives larger attention than any other of the nations. As a compact and convenient manual the work will prove eminently serviceable. (New York: D. Appleton & Co. Pp. 213. 40 cents.)

The Sources of Spenser's Classical Mythology. By Alice E. Sawtelle. The Elizabethan poets were classical scholars also. The illustration of Spenser's mythologic allusions alone, here successfully undertaken, compels reference to almost the whole list of standard authors, and forms a respectable dictionary of mythology. Readers of the "Faerie Queene" will find its pages much more luminous, and their admiration for its author more profound, as they are here reminded of the accuracy and aptness of his use of ores dug from ancient mines. (Boston: Silver, Burdett & Company. Pp. 128.)

The Celestial Summons. By Angelo Canoll. Twelve sermons, with an introductory biographic sketch of their author, are comprised in this handsomely finished volume. The sermons are chaste in phrase, evangelical in substance, and fervently spiritual in tone. Mr. Canoll was an effective worker in the Methodist ministry; in which he served for nearly fifty years, winning golden opinions from his brethren. (New York: Eaton & Mains. Pp. 280. $1.25.)

Makers of the American Republic. By David Gregg. In twelve vigorously patriotic lectures Dr. Gregg outlines the features of the Virginia Cavalier, the Massachusetts Pilgrim and Puritan, the New Amsterdam Dutchman, the Pennsylvania Quaker, and the Huguenot and Scotch immigrants that "salted the porridge" of the new colonial world. Americanism is, in his eyes, so nearly identical with Protestantism that he shows no mercy in his arraignment of the Romish Church as the arch enemy of our liberties. Most of the lectures were given in his own pulpit or elsewhere, on Forefathers' Day or other similar occasions, and bear marks of their origin. They abound in
